

Kew Gardens

Description:

The Royal Botanic Gardens at Kew, London grows more species in its 121 hectares than any other garden in the world and has a long and distinguished history. It's a great family day out – and London Pass holders get free entry, a saving of £11.75 on the adult ticket price. Entry to Kew Park is free for children.

As a UNESCO World Heritage Site, these magnificent London gardens, glasshouses and galleries are a living exhibit as well as an important historical legacy – its modern history really begins in the century when Henry VII moved his court to Richmond Palace in the summer months and nearby Kew village flourished. Since 1840 Kew Park has been open to the public and is without a doubt the most impressive London garden.

Given the size of this London attraction, Kew Garden could easily be a complete day out in itself – bring a picnic or use one of the four restaurants and cafés. A walking tour is a good way to experience the magnificent range of plants from the rainforest through to desert - guided tours of the park leave from Victoria Gate Centre at 11am and 2pm daily.

London visitors should note that Kew Gardens is accessible via the London Underground (Kew has its own stop on the District Line) and mainline rail services (trains depart regularly from central London).
